... genetically engineered hyper-intelligent beings, who were also large and essentially unstoppable. One group of these beings rebelled, overthrew their creators, and destroyed the facility. The Thorne Institute was one of the ... infested facilities, but was fully secure. However, a handful of people survived and escaped with a few personal effects. They were aided by a group of ... creatures known as ... "T-Eaters". These were designed to kill T-virus entities and to promote a perception of threat. When the escapees, human survivors and ... T-Eaters were able to return to the now defenseless city, they found it infested with ... "R-Virus" entities. These were unmodified human beings created as slaves by the remaining ... creatures and were therefore, to them, less than sub-human. The escaped survivors attempted to flee but they were overcome by the R-Virus. The survivors were taken into quarantine. The remaining R-Virus infested people were slaughtered. The survivors who were infected by the T-virus initially suffered the same fate, but as their bodies repaired, they began to die from their wound. They were eventually cured when cured the R-virus entity had been defeated. The cured people were educated as to the events that had transpired. The survivors knew the T-virus was created by ... the ... and other ... creatures. It was then destroyed, and they knew these creatures were dead. There were survivors, however, of ... the original ... creatures. The original creators ... had been seeking a means to use the T-virus as a power source. The survivors ... died off. The last of these creatures are reported to have been wiped out by those who created the virus. It's a shame these articles don't feature a T-tables, and I'm not sure whether the interaction of the survivors would bring about some sort of antagonism between the survivors and T-Eaters A: I'm not an expert, but I'm pretty sure The T-Virus in the book is the same as 82157476af
